Appleby Smith was born in Smithfield towards the end of the 18th century. He became really well-to-do for that particular region in which he lived mainly because of his enterprise. To set-up and operate a woolen mill before the use of steam was introduced was no small job. Waterpower was all there was except manpower and windpower. He had 110 spindles and two looms. When his mill burned down we find the following article in the newspaper.
Providence newspaper of August 19, 1854
Providence, August 13.

Fire at Smithfield.

The mill belonging to Applebee Smith, and occupied by Messrs. Briggs & Allen, in Smithfield, was entirely destroyed by fire on the 11th. The building was valued at about $1,500, and not insured. The machinery and stock were insured at the Appleton Mutual office for $2500.

The following genealogy was brought about by these set of circumstances. On Appleby's death the property consisting largely of real estate was divided among his children. Ada Frances Smith, child number four, received the ten acre lot west of the family burying ground. Ada was second wife of George M. Appleby by whom she bore three children, only one of whom, Jerome H., survived. He in turn married his cousin Emizette F. Smith from whom only one child came into being.

Circumstances brought about the extinction of this line in the following manner. George Henry Appleby, for this was his name, died at the age of 21 years, single and without a will. Then his father Jerome died with a will leaving all his real estate to his wife Emizette. Considerably afterwards December 1, 1926 Emizette passed on with a will.

Neither Ada nor her husband George had wills so it went back to the common ancestor Appleby Smith, dead then 76 years, and so to his descendants. This line became extinct but with eight children there were bound to be plenty of collateral takers and so it proved. In 1921 an attempt was made to get a power of attorney from all the heirs. Some signed up but apparently the whole matter collapsed because of lack of technique in locating persons. Anyway it soon became an utter failure because the party holding the power died thus ending the project. At that time it would have been much easier than at present 1958.

After this another situation arose and that was the yearly imposition of taxes. While some of the heirs paid, it became finally burdensome and they dropped the practice only to lose the property at tax sale to the town of Smithfield. The town now only has one use for a small part of it and that is for a utility building for a decentralized location for snow plows and like equipment. This facility enables the officials to give a quicker and better clearing and repair job of their roads during and after the winter storms and summer washouts. Thus it benefits all of the heirs of Appleby Smith who live thereabouts.

WILLS

The following are wills that have been picked out of Ball's abstract of title. A thorough examination would be necessary to learn if this was complete. It must be borne in mind that a will can change the course of descent. In applying this rule of law it is necessary to study the whole will and not just glance at the residuary clause. The reason for this is that some particular clause might dispose of this ten acre lot in question.

The element of time is important in working out the chain of title where it passes through a will. The particular paragraph may be too early or too late to transmit title.

In going over the genealogy wills were disregarded as being a study all by themselves. The family does not seem to dispose of property outside of their own circle. As a consequence it seems by acquiring as many signatures of those appearing in the genealogy as would sign most property that passed by will would be acquired.
